

Google Scholar is a subset of the Google search engine. While google.com will search the entire world wide web, using Google Scholar, scholar.google.com, limits your search results to those from scholarly sources.

The screenshot shows the Google Scholar interface with the search term 'domestic violence'. The results list several articles. A large yellow arrow labeled 'Full text' points to the article 'Domestic violence: It's not about gender: Or is it?' by MP Johnson, which has a '[PDF] jstor.org Full View' link.

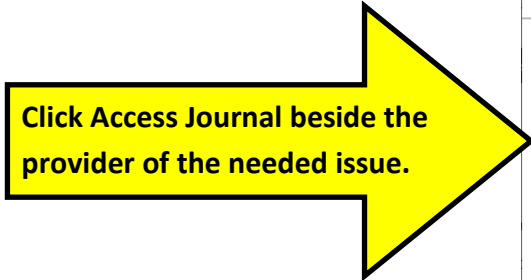

Most results from a Google Scholar search will be from articles, but some other open access materials may also be included.

Although the full text of the article may be available, it may be behind a paywall so that full text access is limited to subscribers of the site.

If you encounter a paywall don't pay for the article. As a UA-PTC student you have access to millions of articles for free through our databases. You can look up the full text of any journal through the UA-PTC Library Catalog accessible on the

To use the UA-PTC Library Catalog, search for the journal title, not the article title. In this example we are searching for the Journal of Marriage and Family, not the article title, Domestic Violence: It's Not about Gender: Or Is It?

The screenshot shows the WorldCat Discovery search interface. The search bar contains 'Journal of Marriage and Family'. Navigation tabs include 'Everything', 'Audio / Video / Images', 'Books', 'Articles / Journals', and 'Open Access'. A 'Search' button and an 'Advanced Search' link are visible.

The screenshot shows the search results for 'Journal of marriage and the family'. It lists the journal title, authors (National Council on Family Relations), and availability status. Below the journal information, there are two options to 'Access journal': one via ProQuest Provider and one via JSTOR Provider. The ProQuest option is highlighted with a yellow arrow from the instruction above.